

GEORGE LOVING'S DEATH IS WIDELY REGRETTED.

He is the Man Who Attempted to Form the Big Cattle Trust a Few Years Ago.—Father Died in New Mexico.

The news of the death of George B. Loving at Fort Worth Thursday last, caused much regret among the cattlemen in El Paso.

Mr. Loving, one of the best known cattlemen of Texas and a prominent figure in newspaper circles in this state for many years, dropped dead on the street as a result of heart failure.

He was about 60 years of age and a pioneer resident of the northwestern part of the state, in which he was born.

All his life he had been an authority upon cattle and at times he was worth large sums of money.

He at one time turned his attention to daily journalism, being at the head of the Fort Worth Gazette during a portion of its palmy days.

Later he founded the Texas Stock Journal, which he forced to the front.

His last great business venture was an effort to form what was called the cattle trust, and it will be recalled that the press of this country and Europe for a time was replete with details of the proposition.

Just at a time when his venture seemed a success, reverses in the money market caused an abandonment of his plans to a certain extent.

His death has removed from Texas live stock circles perhaps the most familiar figure in the business during the past twenty-five years.

In his passing Texas has lost one of her most useful citizens.

Mr. Loving was born in Collin county, near where the town of Plano now stands, on June 10, 1850. His father, Oliver Loving, settled in this state from Kentucky in 1846.

Wounds received in an Indian attack resulted in the death of Mr. Loving's father at Fort Sumner, N. M., a few years ago. He was one of Texas's earliest settlers and Indian fighters.